What is radon?

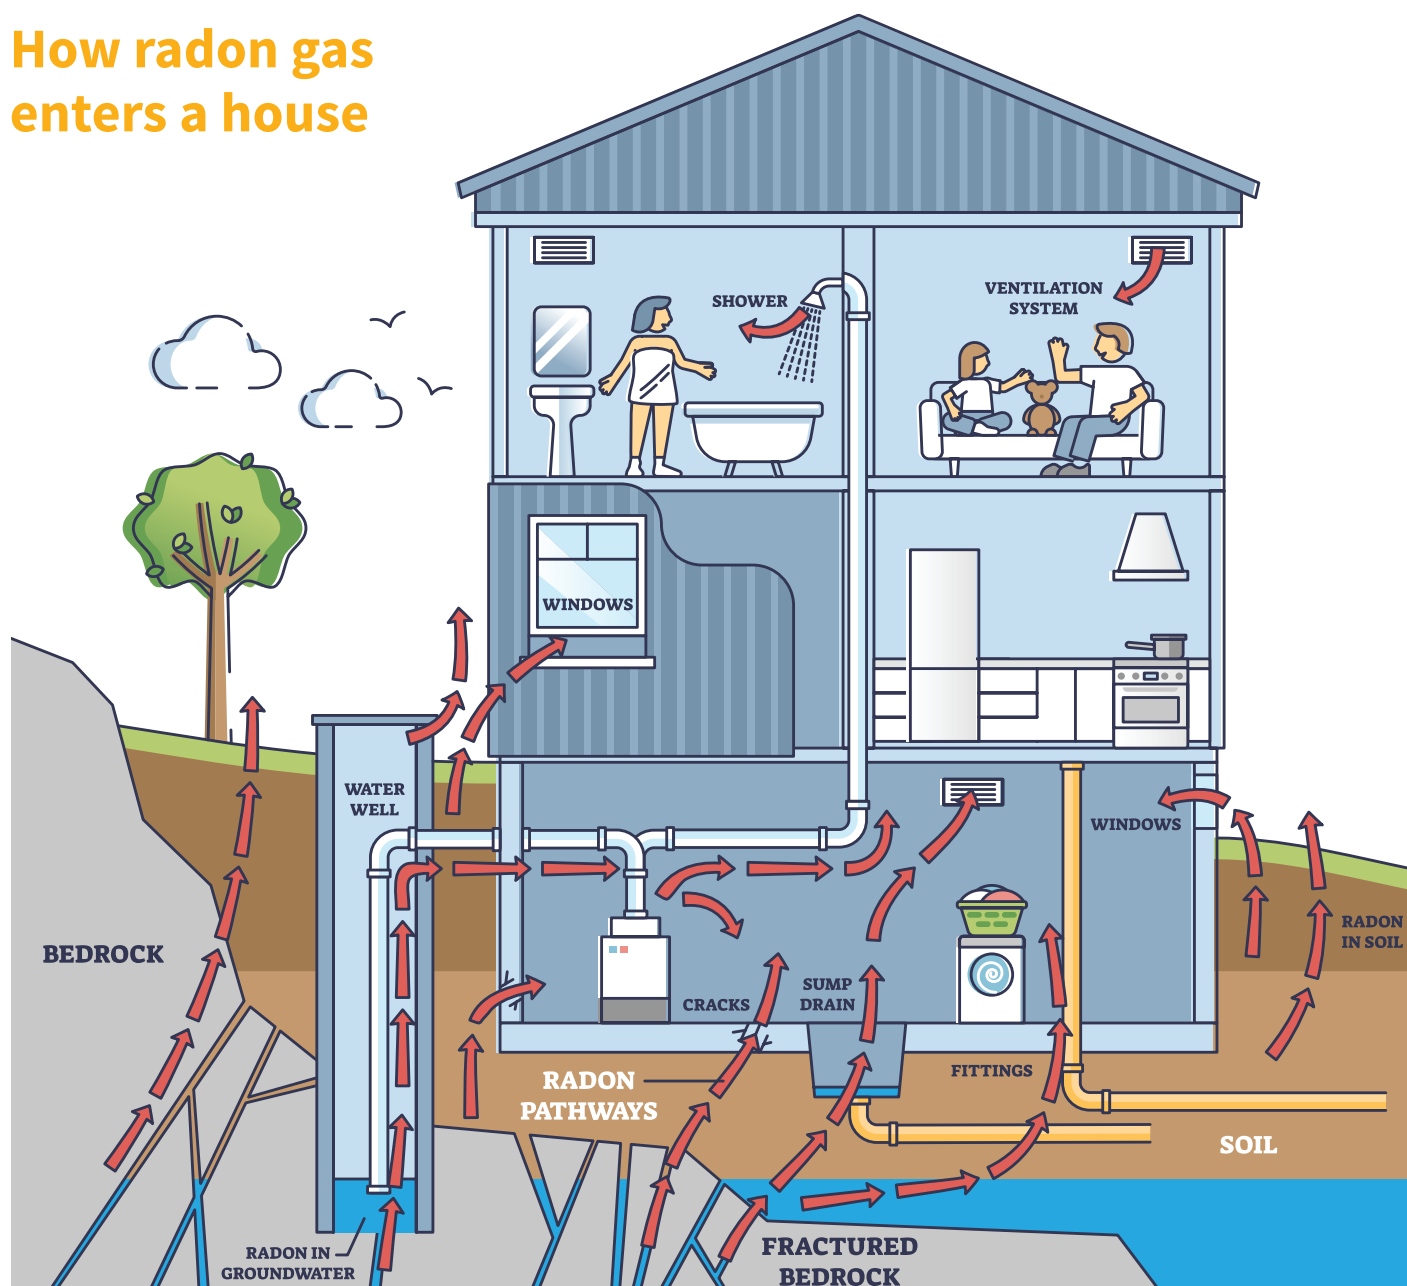

Did you know there could be a silent intruder lurking in your home? Meet radon—a colourless, odourless radioactive gas naturally occurring in many rocks and soils. It can accumulate in indoor spaces, particularly in basements and properties built into hillsides. While radon is a harmless natural occurrence in small amounts, prolonged exposure can be dangerous. It is the second-largest cause of lung cancer in the UK.

Is your property at risk?

If you own a property in Cornwall, it's time to take action. Almost every property in the county is considered part of a Radon Affected Zone, with only a few localised regions like The Lizard and the extreme northeast being exceptions.

The only way to determine if a building has high radon levels is to have it tested. Don't wait for warning signs; take proactive steps to protect your health. The UK Health and Security Agency has published a map that shows areas where high radon levels are more likely. You can explore the interactive map by visiting <https://www.ukradon.org/information/ukmaps>

How radon gas enters a house

Your safety is important to us

At Cormac, we are committed to safeguarding you and those around you. The legislation requires property owners to ensure the health and safety of everyone who lives or works in their spaces. Let us help you fulfil your responsibilities with our radon detection and monitoring services.

How we work

Our approach is straightforward, effective, and non-intrusive. We'll place radon detectors in your property for an initial three-month period. After that, we will analyse the data and share the results with you. Our detailed Risk Assessment outlines the findings in millisieverts (mSv)—a precise measure of exposure—and offers tailored advice on any necessary next steps.

If you want immediate insights, our Canary Pro II monitoring system allows you to track radon fluctuations and stay one step ahead.
